Russian Navy coat, originally worn in the Imperial Navy (note the Imperial Russian eagle buttons), used by the Petrograd sailor Anarchists who took the red ribbon with the black center as an insignia.

Russian tunic (mundir) worn by a high commander of the Anarchist Count Kropotkin's main headquarters. The left sleeve insignia which featured the ubiquitous skull and cross bones (also on the buttons) included the slogan, "Kill Bourgeois" although the Anarchists did not discriminate against killing Bolsheviks as well.

Russian pullover (gimnasterka) with storm trooper flaming bomb insignia on the left sleeve. The carry-over from Imperial uniforms shoulder boards shows a stripe for a gefreiter (equivalent to a sergeant).

Russian tunic (mundir) for a junior officer instructor in a storm troopers' battalion

Russian pullover (gimnasterka) with the large chevron on the right sleeve for a Shock unit.

Russian pullover (gimnasterka) of the typical pre-revolution style with 1917 insignia. The skull and crossbones insignia was for a Shock Battalion.

Russian revolution period armbands signified the wearer's allegiance to a specific group or cause even if a uniform was not worn. The armband was for elite troops made up of St. George's Cross medal recipients for bravery. It was specifically for the Union of St. George Cross Cavaliers. The Cavaliers were conservative army officers who formed the Union after the first Revolution to, according to historian Alexander Rabinowitch, "help arrest the deterioration of the position of officers in the army and to further the cause of victory." The Union was limited to St. George Cross holders "awarded for heroism in battle." Supporters of General Kornilov, later in 1917, they were anti-Bolshevik.

Armband for one of the myriad splinter groups in the turmoil of 1917 Russia, the Patriotic Union of Russia whose members swore to keep Russia united. Materials for armbands came from what was available; in this case velvet cloth as the body of the armband.

Polish White Cross Society flag. The Polish White Cross Society was formed on October 31, 1917 by Helena Paderewski (also spelled Paderewska) at first for the welfare and nursing care of general Haller's Polish Army in France. Although Poland was not yet an independent country in 1917, many of her sons fought on the Allied side. Helena Paderewski, wife of the celebrated pianist Ignacy Jan Paderewski, eventually grew the Polish White Cross Society to 20,000 members to aid victims of war. She recruited nurses from the Polish-American communities in the United States to serve in France.
